The player hit the ground running with a simple x, y, up, down, left, right interface. Hold down the mouse button, move the mouse, and the player will move in the direction of the mouse pointer. I'm using a big MGE fonetic font for the text. Then I made the "MGE Player" a little bit taller with a menu-bar. Then I added some transparency and a fade-in after the first frames. Then I added a menu with some sound effects and songs that were pretty famous during the early video games. Then I used a device to fade out the background with the cellophane effect. Then I used some of the same frames over and over and over again. I think it looks pretty neat. Coco Free is a nice free game from Zynga and contains a wide range of fun features. In the four-player mini-game, you play for points against other players by designing the world's cutest creatures. At first, you will have an overworld showing your standard, limited palette of colors, though this can be expanded. Just swipe to the left to display more palettes, which usually consist of a small collection of colors and shapes, and finally pick one to set the size of your colorful collection. There are also four animals with which you can design a creature, each with their own preferences for color and texture. For the purposes of this article, I will be using the cat, but you can also play with the bird, the dog, and the snail, as well as the mighty Elephant, Ostrich, and the underwater crab. Each animal's palette of colors is limited to a small number, and many are only able to be viewed with a microscope, which you will need to activate by swiping left after selecting a color. Also, a few colors must be collected in a specific order before they can be seen, but each of these colors can only be held once. The size of your palette is also dependent on how large your animals are, and you can shrink them or expand them, albeit not via a continuous gradient, but by tapping on a specific part of an animal for a few seconds and then tapping another area for a similar amount of time. Just keep in mind that some of the larger or more detailed animals can only be displayed in their fully-grown form, as your game will not display the smaller or details version in order to conserve space. The cat is also the only animal that can grow
