New York City is giving local food delivery start-up Caviar $125,000 in seed money and a six-month lease on a warehouse space downtown to help the company expand its fleet of deliveries. This winter, Caviar aims to debut a delivery service for food from organic farms, fishmongers and takeout joints, continuing a mission to help combat the onslaught of restaurant and takeout apps like GrubHub and UberEats. Caviar is a restaurant platform where people order from local and artisanal restaurant menus, and then can track their packages and track the locations of the restaurants. When it began in 2015, the company was financed by chef and restaurateur Brian Malarkey, who was looking for a new venture after the Wall Street Journal, which he also owned at the time, shuttered the restaurant his father co-founded, the Dirt Candy food truck. The company's new downtown location, from the Downtown Industrial Port Authority, should give the company room to grow. While the company will work out of a warehouse by Pier 17 in Brooklyn, it won't need to store massive amounts of food: It's turning some of its restaurants into "ships," which are empty containers that have been modified into restaurants. The company aims to have a fleet of at least 100 ships around Manhattan and Brooklyn. The new warehouses, including one in the area of Pier 17 where Caviar is headquartered, are meant to be more environmentally friendly: empty shipping containers are easy to recycle and to re-use. Caviar's new venture is bringing together a group of businesses that have been at the center of New York's food scene for years. For Caviar, it has the blessing of restaurant and farmer Isaac Wainer, who leads a collective of chefs, farmers and artisans. Wainer says food trends can be hard to predict, but he was aware of how powerful that "artisanal" title was in its own right, having already helped build a farming infrastructure and food pipeline in Astoria, Queens, where most of Wainer's restaurants are. Wainer, who will be executive chef at the new Caviar kitchen, says there's the ebb and flow of the ups and downs of bff6bb2d33
