WindowPlay is a small and unusual application that does just what it claims: it activates the system sounds and changes the visual theme of your system, thanks to a small panel of quick play controls that can be activated by clicking on the tray icon. In order to keep the application as small as possible, the user interface is a plain text box, with one button that will activate the desired visual setting of the system. The application is marketed mainly for those users who are not fond of having the Windows system sounds and visual theme change frequently, because it is only designed to offer a small amount of options and to make such changes easily. No visuals, only sounds Clicking on the tray icon brings a little panel up, with a series of sound controls in the form of a familiar Windows menu, such as "Action Sounds", "Alerts", "Ringtones" and "Desktop Sounds". These settings can be configured as you please, which allows you to change the type of sound it is connected to all the sounds available for your system, change their volume or specify their placement on the system's taskbar. The choice of assigning specific sounds to particular actions is fairly personal, so you can easily decide that you prefer your system to use a specific sound whenever the task that requires it is performed. QuickPlay isn't exactly a new tool, but its solid user interface will make sure to keep you confident and will let you configure each sound at will. It is a bit more convenient for users that can't stand their system being subjected to constant changes, but for those who like to configure their system using their imagination, it isn't a bad choice at all. Mac OSX Sounds is a small collection of audio files for replacing the default sounds of the system and is designed to let you change the sounds for specific application, system activities or desktop elements. There are no visuals or any other user interface to speak of, as everything is handled through a series of sound files with matching codes that Mac users can assign to their system actions using the SoundPackager from Stardock Corporation. If you decide to change the sounds, then just drag and drop the files you prefer on the SoundPackager interface in a matter of minutes. You may also add your own sounds for when the actions should take place, which can even be tied to existing files to ensure they are recognized too. Mac OSX Sounds is a nice and handy tool that can be a good option for anyone who likes changing the sounds of b7e8fdf5c8
